8-25-2013

Handwriting Woes!

John Baranik

University of Pennsylvania

Follow this and additional works at: http://repository.upenn.edu/manuscript_collective_blog

Recommended Citation

http://repository.upenn.edu/manuscript_collective_blog/10

https://pennmanuscriptcollective.wordpress.com/2013/08/25/handwriting-woes/

This paper is posted at ScholarlyCommons. http://repository.upenn.edu/manuscript_collective_blog/10
For more information, please contact repository@pobox.upenn.edu.
Handwriting Woes!

View on Penn Manuscript Collective Blog
https://pennmanuscriptcollective.wordpress.com/2013/08/25/handwriting-woes/

Creative Commons License

This work is licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 License.
Handwriting Woes!

Posted by John Baranik in Summer 2013

In the middle of a relaxing day of vacation, I opened my inbox to an email from Professor Stallybrass. He was writing about handwriting—Benjamin Franklin’s handwriting. In the 1930s, Penn acquired what was believed to be the extant manuscript of Benjamin Franklin, entitled “Elegy on My Sister Franklin.” The Library Chronicle announced this acquisition as "one of the most important events in the recent history of the Library.” Carl Van Doren, writer and writer of the 1938 Pulitzer prize-winning biography Benjamin Franklin, was the first writer to include the "Elegy" in any Franklin biography. In a widely printed newspaper article by Elmo Scott Watson, Van Doren remarked

[the Elegy] was only recently discovered...The precise date of the elegy is still uncertain, as is the name of the sister-in-law whose death called forth...These are perhaps the earliest surviving words of Franklin, written when he had not yet finally decided between poetry and prose.

This newspaper article (and the Library Chronicle article) describe Elegy in terms that suggest that the author of the manuscript is undoubtedly written by Franklin: “the fact is that his writing career started with a poem!” Indeed, the Library Chronicle calls the manuscript of the Elegy a “unique treasure.”
The only facts in question seem to be the date of the manuscript—the writer of the Library Chronicle writes that it most likely was written soon after 1718. This dates to about the time that Franklin was apprenticed to his brother James in Boston and began to become interested in poetry, composing a number of "little pieces." James, a printer, saw the value in having fresh literature to print and encouraged young Benjamin to compose. One such ballad, The Lighthouse Tragedy, was written about a recent drowning of a Captain Worthilake and his daughters. It "sold wonderfully, the event being recent," wrote Franklin, admitting that "this flattered my vanity." Franklin's father, however, intervened, criticizing Franklin's poetry and reminding him that "verse-makers were generally beggars."

Four years later, in a June issue of the New England Courant, there appeared "A RECEIPT to make a New England Funeral ELEGY," written by Franklin's now famous pseudonym, Silence Dogood. These instructions call for the creation of cloying expressions of grief and overly simple or cliche rhymes, directions which seem to suggest a sixteen-year-old Franklin looking back with disdain upon his younger poetry. The Library Chronicle reads:

There can be little doubt, we think, that the "Elegy on My Sister Franklin" was written in 1718 or shortly after, in the period when the ambitious young printer's apprentice, with vanity flattered by the success of "The Lighthouse tragedy" and other ballads, had not yet perceived the probability of his becoming but "a very bad poet."

Little doubt. But over eighty years later, when browsing the Franklin Papers, the Elegy appears in brackets—it has been dis-attributed to Franklin.
How can we know if this was the work of Franklin or not? I set to work to try to answer this question, building a new alphabet table from Franklin's Elegy. I also used images from 1732 of Franklin’s handwriting when he was drafting an article for the Pennsylvania Gazette.

Results? Inconclusive. I have, however, found some interesting patterns in the handwriting in the Elegy. Many, lowercase “d’s,” for example, have ascenders that become spirals. Even without sampling every single lowercase “d” in the Elegy, I found them to occur often.

As seen in the images above, I have not found this shape to occur anywhere else in Franklin’s handwriting.

Likewise, capital “E’s” in the Elegy were more elaborate, featuring a loop instead of a crook in their middles, a shape that I have not found in any other Franklin handwriting.
The capital “M’s” are very consistent across the Elegy, Gazette, and Autobiography.

Given these mixed results (and dozens of other similar image comparisons), the jury is still out as to whether the Elegy is Franklin’s hand or not. If his handwriting mirrored his style of poetry at this time, perhaps the elaborate script in the Elegy is his…but MUCH work still remains to be done. In the meantime, I’ll continue to compile and compare images of different documents from Franklin’s life. Image scanning and editing is going well for the John Rowe Parker Correspondence! So far about 250 images have been scanned and edited. While scanning is time consuming, the 600dpi resolution is incredible! I look forward to using close-ups from these huge image files.
— Editing the images in Picasa

Advertisements

Create a space for your passion

Get Started

WordPress.com

Create a space for your passion

Get Started

WordPress.com

Share this: Twitter Facebook

Like

Be the first to like this.

Related

Introductions, part 1 In "Summer 2013"
And we're off! In "Academic Year 2013-2014"
Writing on Writing on Writing: An afternoon's foray into marginalia and revisions