

University of Pennsylvania
ScholarlyCommons

Departmental Papers (ASC)

Annenberg School for Communication

2-23-2007

Public Media in the Arab World: Exploring the Gap Between Reality and Ideals

Marwan M. Kraidy

University of Pennsylvania, kraidy@asc.upenn.edu

Follow this and additional works at: https://repository.upenn.edu/asc_papers

 Part of the Communication Commons

Recommended Citation

Kraidy, M. M. (2007). Public Media in the Arab World: Exploring the Gap Between Reality and Ideals. Center for Social Media, Retrieved from https://repository.upenn.edu/asc_papers/181

A report for the Center for Social Media, American University. Washington, D.C.

This paper is posted at ScholarlyCommons. https://repository.upenn.edu/asc_papers/181
For more information, please contact repository@pobox.upenn.edu.

Public Media in the Arab World: Exploring the Gap Between Reality and Ideals

Abstract

The Center for Social Media collaborated with the Arab Media and Public Life (AMPLE) project at American University for a year-long conference series on public media in the Arab world and focused on changes in the media environment, the role of the state, and what “public media” means in the Arab world. Themes that emerged in the series included the tension between political and business interests, and the public interest. Additionally, the series explored the effects of interaction of local audiences with transnational media, the role of traditional versus non-traditional media, changes in the media despite political stagnation, globalization and popular culture, and the difference between “public” and “audience.” In this context, can we speak of a “public” or is it more rigorous to refer to plural “publics” when discussing transnational satellite television? If there are several publics, then how is the “public interest” defined? The project proceeded over three convenings, which featured presentations by leaders in the field and the development of an agenda for research and practice to expand the scope of public media geographically, conceptually and topically

Keywords

Arab world, media

Disciplines

Communication | Social and Behavioral Sciences

Comments

A report for the Center for Social Media, American University. Washington, D.C.

Center for Social Media

Public Media in the Arab World Exploring the Gap between Reality and Ideals

February 23, 2007

American University, Washington, DC

*A report by Marwan. M. Kraidy
Director, Arab Media and Public Life (AMPLE) project, with assistance from Courtney Radsch*

A Joint Project of:
Center for Social Media, School of Communication
International Communication Program, School of International Service

Funded by the Ford Foundation

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY:

The Center for Social Media collaborated with the Arab Media and Public Life (AMPLE) project at American University for a year-long conference series on public media in the Arab world and focused on changes in the media environment, the role of the state, and what “public media” means in the Arab world. Themes that emerged in the series included the tension between political and business interests, and the public interest. Additionally, the series explored the effects of interaction of local audiences with transnational media, the role of traditional versus non-traditional media, changes in the media despite political stagnation, globalization and popular culture, and the difference between “public” and “audience.” In this context, can we speak of a “public” or is it more rigorous to refer to plural “publics” when discussing transnational satellite television? If there are several publics, then how is the “public interest” defined?

The project proceeded over three convenings, which featured presentations by leaders in the field and the development of an agenda for research and practice to expand the scope of public media geographically, conceptually and topically.

CONVENING OBJECTIVES:

The full-day, invitation-only convenings were held on the campus of American University. Top scholars, researchers, diplomats and professionals with expertise on Arab media issues came together to explore the gap between reality and ideals when it comes to public media in the Arab world. Our objectives were:

- To internationalize the scope of the public media model. The future of public media is transnational and global, making it important to address the imperatives of looking at public media beyond the context of the United States and Western Europe. The Arab world is a very interesting case study of a transnational public sphere, whose media and public discourse are currently the subject of heated debates from Washington to Beirut.
- To expand the boundaries of the notion of public media. The globalization of the notion of public media involves definitional challenges. The Arab world provides a concrete context where variations on the notion of public media can be explored. Since there are no media institutions devoted to the public interest, can mainstream, commercial or government-owned channels fulfill the role of public media? Under what circumstances?
- To explore the overlaps between public media and alternative forms of speech. To what extent can alternative channels of communication—cartoons, songs, sermons, youth-produced videos, activist blogs—serve the public interest? How do these small and alternative media relate to major media institutions? Does the relation between “big” and “small” media suggest an alternative notion of public media?

DISCUSSION:

Political Cartoons as Public Media

The first presentation and discussion focused on Egyptian political cartoons and their role in Arab public media. Political cartoons in Egypt often focus on topics such as legitimacy, the distribution of power, and power relationships and serve as an expressive form of public media to the extent that they subvert established channels of authority, necessitate relatively minor formal education but require local cultural knowledge.

These political cartoons serve the public interest in Egypt because they focus attention on local issues, both political (i.e. lack of freedom of speech, status of women in the public sphere) and practical (i.e. local government corruption and how it impacts garbage collection, for example). Examples highlighted during the discussion suggest that the impact of such cartoons, which usually appear on the editorial page, results from their engagement with contentious issues in the public sphere and their focus on how Egyptians view themselves and others.

Though political cartoons regularly break out of private interests, they remain part of mainstream Arab media controlled by an alliance of political and economic interests.

Impact of Youth Media

In contrast, youth generated media like wartime blogging in Lebanon and racing videos in Saudi Arabia constitute a radical alternative to mainstream media. These youth-generated media showcase the symbiotic relationship between creativity and activism. For example, the Lebanese blogger FinkPloyd started a network of bloggers who write about cities in a format similar to that of his own blogginbeirut.com blog.

The information and opinion provided by these citizen-journalists has become a platform for activists and grew to include online televised reports that enabled a sequence linking media and action to emerge. Although the effort started after former Lebanese President Rafik Hariri's assassination in 2005, the blogging network that emerged during the Israel-Hizbollah war in 2006 focused on telling stories that were not told in the news about youth going out, having fun and living their daily lives rather than overtly political messages. Similarly, youth-produced videos in Saudi Arabia provide a grassroots, non-commercial and publicly available expression of youth rebellion that contrasts sharply with the commoditized and commercialized youth identities and behaviors offered by mainstream media.

The tension between self-expression and the potential institutionalization of youth-generated videos and other alternative media is an important issue for the future of public media in the Arab world. Developing Arab public media must entail taking into consideration the notion of alterity, which has to be self-attributed by the audience and public, as participatory and non-hierarchical. Public media must reflect multiple self-representations and representations by others.

Alternative media, from Al Jazeera to blogs, challenge the underlying relationship between the state and the public yet nonetheless operate within the structure of the nation-state. Nonetheless, these media contribute to the emergence of new identities, to the indigenization and localization of media content, and to the emergence of multiple publics (rather than the assumption of one singular Arab public, often described as the “Arab street”).

Challenges of Arab public media

Even as content is localized, it is also globalized and delocalized. The case of Egyptian blogs illustrate a three-step flow in which Egyptian journalistic bloggers report on local events, which were then used as sources for articles by Western journalists in the mainstream press, at which point these stories could either be re-localized and regionalized by being picked up in the Arab media. Local stories of abuse and imprisonment of activists, for example, are re-localized only after being globalized. The prevalence of English-language blogging in Egypt further raises questions about the “public” in public media, as creators of media relinquish their native language, whether it is to escape censorship or to communicate with Western journalists. It also compels reflection about whether alternative media become significant only after being relayed by mainstream media.

Questions about the intended audience—how to define the public, and hence public media – in a globalized and interconnected world, and whether the traditional distinction between media producers and consumers still makes sense, challenge assumptions about Arab media and the constitution of the public sphere. Citizen journalism and alternative media underscore the availability of personal reflections and individual interpretations of local, regional and global events that provide alternative perspectives to those promoted by the mainstream media in the Arab world and the West. These increasingly popular and significant media speak to diverse audiences and challenge the notion of a public confined within the nation-state. They suggest that the future of Arab public media is truly transnational.

Understandability across cultural and political borders emerged as a particularly salient issue as the scope of public media broadens in the future. Primarily visual media like political cartoons and youth generated media lack narrative or explanation with which to put the images into context. In such visually dominant media, therefore, the few words that may be included are thus especially important yet often do little to add context that would enable understanding along the lines intended by the producer of the media. For example, the word “Erhabe”, which means “terrorist,” appeared in the English-transliteration of the video of Saudi “drifting”, raising questions about what the word meant and symbolized as well as to whom it was directed. The incongruity of images and words in these alternative media, from political cartoons to videos, is significant and highlights the need to explore the self-identification of these producers of public media.

Although much of our discussion revolved around optimistic outlooks on the power of alternative media in the public sphere, there were also warnings about ascribing too much power to technology and the need to examine whether a true public media can exist without a regulatory and juridical framework that protects freedom of association and cultural expression. The record of government institutions in the Arab world is not encouraging, and public media initiative can only develop in tandem with other grassroots civil society groups focused on reforming the judiciary and media governance processes. Assuming a causal relationship between media and the political system in the Arab world obscures various ways that regimes have found to coopt non-mainstream media and other forms of speech.

CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

There are nontraditional ways in which speech and social criticism can be performed, from cartoons to videos to other non-traditional or authorized streams of communication. The notion of public media needs to be flexible to accommodate emergent forms of social and alternative communication. The importance of self-representation as opposed to representation by others is at the heart of the debate on Arab media's role in public life and is an area where citizen generated media like blogs become so important.

The trend toward citizen media has also perhaps been aided by the increasing commercialization of Arab media, which is leading to greater specialization and challenging the state/private dichotomy. In spite of the dynamism of mediated forms of expression, the Arab world remains politically stagnant. Structures of credibility and accountability have to be established. These must be indigenous because if they are imported or imposed from the outside under the rubric of reforming the Middle East, they will play in the hand of information control and censorship.

We also identified future avenues for exploration, including focusing on the creation of media by a more diverse group of people; focusing on popular culture and mediated entertainment as an avenue for public discourse; expanding the analysis to radio and documentary in the Arab world, which have so far received little interest if any at all; exploring what kinds of media enable the expression of various marginalized narratives related to social agency and various publics; re-conceptualizing the notion of public interest and public media to make them more inclusive; and examining Arabic-language media activism.

In summary, issues that need further research and action are:

- Localism vs. regionalism. Localism has traditionally been an important dimension of public media in North America and Western Europe. In contrast, Arab media that come nearest to being public media focus on regional (i.e. pan-Arab) issues, at the expense of localism, in what has been called “anywhere but here” media.
- Media dynamism vs. political stagnation. There is a huge gap between the dynamism and profound transformation of media in the Arab world and the impact that this dynamism has had on political processes and institutions.
- Self-representation vs. representation by others. An exploration of the kinds of media that enables self-expression at the individual and social level is overdue. We believe this key to understanding the future of public media.
- News & public affairs vs. entertainment. This distinction is untenable, since in authoritarian environments entertainment can perform as public media by broaching issues of public interest and attracting sustained attention from various publics.

- Traditional vs. non-traditional media. How do television, radio, and the press interact with sermons, music videos and blogs? How do inter-media configurations contribute to our re-thinking of the notion of public media?
- Structures and institutions of monitoring and evaluation. Are these best understood as state-sponsored institutions? Or would they be more effective and/or accountable were they to hail from civil society groups?

BIOGRAPHIES OF PARTICIPANTS

Kevin Dwyer is Professor of Anthropology at the American University in Cairo and the author of Moroccan Dialogues: anthropology in question; Arab Voices: the human rights debate in the Middle East, and Beyond Casablanca: M.A. Tazi and the adventure of Moroccan cinema. For the academic year 2006-2007 he is a fellow at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars in Washington, D.C.

Emile El-Hokayem is a Research Fellow with the Henry L. Stimson Center's Southwest Asia/Gulf program, where he focuses on the security and politics of the Persian Gulf, with a particular emphasis on the Iranian nuclear issue, Iran-GCC relations and regional security. El-Hokayem holds degrees from Georgetown University and the University of Paris-Dauphine.

Mark Jurkowitz is Associate Director of the Project for Excellence in Journalism and has spent nearly two decades covering the news media. He was the press critic and author of the Boston Phoenix's "Don't Quote Me" column from 1987-1994 and again from July 2005 until June 2006. In between, he spent 10 years at The Boston Globe, initially as the paper's ombudsman and then as its first full-time media beat writer.

Patricia Karam is a Senior Program Officer at the United States Institute of Peace, where she is responsible for a portfolio of grants to promote conflict prevention and peace building in Iraq and Colombia. Karam is currently is a Henry J. McCracken Fellow (on leave) at New York University's Law and Society Ph.D. program.

Laurie Kassman is Director of Communications and Outreach for the Middle East Institute. Previously she was a foreign correspondent for the Voice of America, working in a number of bureaus throughout the Middle East, Europe, and Central America, including four years as the Cairo bureau chief. She is a member of the Editorial Board of the Foreign Service Journal and a member of the Board of ANERA (American Near East Refugee Aid).

Joe Khalil is pursuing his doctorate at Southern Illinois University, Carbondale where he focuses on youth generated media and activism. He has worked form more than 10 years at various Arab media corporations as director, producer, and executive producer, and taught at various universities in the Middle East. His publications have appeared in Transnational Broadcasting Studies and Middle East Broadcasters.

Laurie King-Irani teaches Anthropology at the Catholic University in Washington, D.C. She has previously taught at universities in Canada and Lebanon, served as editor of MERIP Reports, and done extensive fieldwork in Lebanon and Israel. She received her Ph.D. in Anthropology from Indiana University.

Adel Iskander teaches communication at the University of Texas, Austin. He is co-author of Al-Jazeera: How the Free Arab News Network Scooped the World and Changed the Middle East. He is currently working on US Public Diplomacy, Culture, and Arab Audiences and El-Islam: Muslims and the Internet.

Marwan Kraidy is Director of the Arab Media and Public Life (AMPLE) project and Scholar-in-Residence at the Annenberg School for Communication at the University of Pennsylvania. He published Global Media Studies: Ethnographic Perspectives and Hybridity, or, The Cultural Logic of Globalization, and is currently writing Screens of Contention: Reality Television and Arab Public Life, and Arab Television Industries.

David Marash joined Al Jazeera English from the ABC News' Nightline where he won Emmy Awards in 1994, 1996, and 1997. He has won Du Pont, Global Health and Overseas Press club awards for his reports on the 1972 hostage killings at the 1972 Munich Olympics, the AIDS epidemic in Zimbabwe, and the 2005 Asian Tsunami, Courtney C. Radsch is a Ph.D. candidate in international communication at American University. She previously worked at the New York Times and the Daily Star in Beirut, Lebanon, continues to work as a freelance journalist, and is book review editor for Arab Media & Society.

Clay Ramsey is the Research Director of the Center for Policy Attitudes and a Fellow at the Center for International and Security Studies at Maryland. He received his Ph.D. in History from Stanford University and is the author of The Ideology of the Great Fear.

William A. Rugh was career U.S. Foreign Service Officer for 31 years, during which he had assignments in Jidda, Cairo, Riyadh and Damascus. He was U.S. Ambassador to Yemen Arab Republic and the United Arab Emirates. From 1995 until 2003 he was President and CEO of the American non-profit organization AMIDEAST. He is the author of Arab Mass Media: News Media and Political Process in the Arab World and American Encounters with Arabs: the 'Soft Power' of U.S. Public Diplomacy in the Arab World.

Cynthia P. Schneider is Distinguished Professor in the Practice of Diplomacy at Georgetown University. She was U.S. Ambassador to the Netherlands where she led initiatives in cultural and public diplomacy. Currently, she is a non-resident Senior Fellow with the Brookings Institution where she leads the Arts and Cultural Initiative within the Project on Us Relations with the Islamic World. She earned a Ph.D. in Fine Arts from Harvard University.

Loubna Skalli Hanna's research and teaching focus on media, culture, development and gender in the Middle East and North Africa. She has taught at various Moroccan universities, co-authored Vulture Culture: the Politics and Pedagogy of Talk Shows, and authored The Articulation of the Local and the Global: Women's Press in Morocco. She received her Ph.D. from the Pennsylvania State University.

Samara Aberman They covers media, arts and culture for the NewsHour with Jim Lehrer on PBS.

Shalini Venturelli is Director and Associate Professor of the International Communication Division in the School of International Service at the American University in Washington, D.C. She is the author of Liberalizing the European Media: Politics, Regulation and the Public Sphere, and is now working on Dynamics of Knowledge Culture: Civil Society, Culture & Ideas in the Global Information Age.

M. Karen Walker is pursuing a doctorate in communication at the University of Maryland, following several years of government service. She is interested in the rhetoric of charismatic leaders, the role and persuasive effect of public diplomacy initiatives, and identity formation and expression within the Arab public sphere.