NOTES

‘SCEMARE’, OR APPROACHING “VIRGILINESS”

J.C. WILES, University of Cambridge

Any examination of the phenomenon of absence in the Commedia must account for a crucial linguistic issue: though they are amply attested in the Commedia’s sources, the words assenza, assente, and their derivatives are themselves conspicuously absent from the poem’s lexicon. Absence experiences are expressed in the poem partly through imagery and circumlocution, but also through a constellation of individual words which invoke experiences of absence without naming absence as such. One particularly suggestive word operating within this language of omission is the verb scemare. With a focus on Purgatorio 30, in this paper, I discuss the importance of scemare to Dante’s lexicon of exclusion, and the ways in which it shapes our experience and understanding of absence in the Commedia more broadly.

Keywords: Absence, Affect, Presence, Scemare, Virgil.

If a discussion of absence in the Commedia, a poem so richly populated with characters, and so driven by interpersonal encounter and exchange, is not to be doomed from the start, it has to account for crucial linguistic issue. Though they are attested elsewhere in Dante’s work, the words assenza, assente, and their derivatives are themselves conspicuously absent from the poem’s lexicon. Like the word empireo, which disappears after the second canto of Inferno to be replaced by periphrases of increasing ambition and effulgence, the concept of absence is articulated only

1 This article began as a contribution to the panel “Dante Spaces/Spaces for Dante,” which formed part of the Centenary Celebration of New Voices in UK and Irish Dante Studies, held in Cambridge and Oxford in November 2021. I am grateful to the organizers, participants, and especially my fellow panelists, Edward Allnutt, Alessia Carrai, Nicolò Crisafi, and Tommaso Priviero, as well as to our chair, Catherine Keen, for the generosity of their ideas and discussion both before and after the event.
indirectly. This is achieved partly through imagery and circumlocution, but also through a constellation of individual words which invoke experiences of absence without naming absence as such.

A particularly suggestive word operating within Dante’s lexicon of exclusion and omission is the verb scemare. Seeing only sparing use elsewhere in his work, it appears with relative frequency in the Commedia. Where it appears as a verb, commentators have generally glossed scemare as roughly equivalent to “diminuire.” Where it appears in its adjectival form, “scemaro,” it has been read as synonymous with “manchevole” or, more commonly, “privaro.” It seems to me, however, that “privaro” does not fully convey the sense of “scemaro” as Dante uses it. “Privaro” also appears in the Commedia, and in each instance it serves a markedly different function to “scemaro.” Where privare and its derivatives occur, they signal a complete loss or deprivation: the devil from whose grip Bonconte da Montefeltro is saved by an angel cries “O tu del ciel, perchè mi privi?” (Purg. 5.105); Dante is able to ascend to Paradise only when he is completely “privo / d’impedimento” (Par. 1.139-140). While privare communicates a state of total lack, the deprivation implied by scemare is rather more nuanced. In each case, it denotes a reduction of one kind or another, though, crucially, not to zero. Thus, as Dante and Virgil take their leave of the pagan poets in Limbo, Dante writes that “La sesta compagnia in due si scema” (Inf. 4.148): the “bella scola” is diminished, but does not disappear entirely (Inf. 4.94). This first instance of its use is indicative of how Dante will go on to use scemare to express nuances that privare cannot convey. For where privare suggests a binary distinction between presence and absence, “having” or “not having,” scemare allows for gradations to be expressed between the ostensibly polarized concepts.

5 I have adopted schwa here as a means of conveying gender neutrality in base forms of Italian adjectives. I am grateful to Dario Galassini for our discussion of this. For glosses of “scemaro” as “privaro,” see Chiavacci Leonardi, note on Purg. 12.9, 354; Giorgio Inglese, note to Purgatorio 30.49 in Dante Alighieri, Commedia, vol. 2, ed. Giorgio Inglese (Rome: Carocci editore, 2007-2016), 361. For a gloss as “manchevole” see Chiavacci Leonardi, note to Purg. 17.85, 505.
A cross-cantica tally of scemare’s occurrences reveals that it is a distinctly purgatorial word, appearing a dozen times in the second cantica, compared to Inferno’s three, and Paradiso’s six. Perhaps this should not surprise us. Purgatorio is, after all, a space for the cultivation of paradisiacal lightness, and the lessening of spiritual heaviness. As the souls work through this process of spiritual lightening, however, it should not escape our notice that things are constantly visibly diminishing and disappearing in Purgatorio. Despite its investment in return and reunion, we as readers are particularly subject in Purgatorio to what Daniel Heller-Roazen, in his recent book Absentees, on Variously Missing Persons, calls “forms of diminution”: processes by which people, places, and things have their presence lessened. Scemare plays a key role in the articulation of these processes. In an early instance of its use in Purgatorio, Dante describes “lo scemo de la luna” (Purg. 10.14), connecting scemare to the distinctly purgatorial image of the moon fading and returning each day on the mountain. Scemare also appears in Virgil’s account of the purgative process of the second realm: “L’amor del bene, scemo / del suo dover, quiritta si ristora” (Purg. 17.85-87). Indeed, the mountain itself appears “scemo / a guisa che i vallon li scamn quici” as the poets arrive in the Valley of the Princes (Purg. 7.65-66). In each case, scemare denotes a reduction of presence, be it geological, astronomical, personal, or spiritual, and this feeds into a wider juxtaposition between absence and presence in Purgatorio as a whole.

Dante and the reader are increasingly exposed to such lessenings as the cantica gradually moves towards its culminating drama of personal absence and presence in the Earthly Paradise. I use the word “personal” here to refer to the presence/absence of characters as an alternative to the more widespread notion of “physical absence/presence,” since such terms can hold only the most limited currency in the case of the Commedia, populated as it is almost exclusively by “ombre vane” (Purg. 2.79). The presence/absence of his dead souls’ aerial bodies is in fact the very first issue that Dante confronts when he first interacts with a dead soul in the selva oscura:

---

6 cf. Dante’s ease of movement in Purgatorio 12.10-12: “Io m’era mosso, e seguia volontieri / del mio maestro i passi, e amendue / già mostravam com’eravam leggeri.”

> Quando vidi costui nel gran diserto,
> “Miserere di me,” gridai a lui,
> “qual che tu sii, od ombra od omo certo!”
> Rispuosemi: “Non omo, omo già fui,
> e li parenti miei furon lombardi,
> mantoani per patria ambedui” (Inf. 1.64-69)

Dante cannot be sure if he is calling to a “true” human being, or a shadow, and this uncertainty proves crucial to the way in which the dialectic of absence and presence is articulated throughout the Commedia. Even in the poem’s first encounter, then, Dante consciously blurs the boundaries between presence and absence, introducing a focal tension around the tangibility of the souls in the afterlife. Otherworldly presence, as Manuele Gragnolati has persuasively argued, depends on factors other than physicality: our experience of the souls of the afterlife, each with their own “corpo fittizio” (Purg. 26.12), cannot be understood with any consistency in physical terms.\(^9\) This poem-wide metaphysical issue complicates the Commedia’s relationship with absence long before any direct reference is made to any character conspicuously “missing” from the poem’s narrative, and Dante’s frequent re-problematizing of the issue requires that we read beyond any simple polarity between physical and non-physical. Indeed, I would suggest that his work at large lays out notions of presence and absence which transcend any simple binary distinctions. It is a dynamic dialectic upon which the narrative fabric of the Commedia fundamentally depends, and this is especially true of Purgatorio 30, which marks the moment of Virgil’s personal departure from the poem. On finally sensing Beatrice’s presence, Dante turns to the left:

> per dicere a Virgilio: ‘Men che dramma > di sangue m’è rimaso che non tremi:
> conosco i segni de l’antica fiamma.’
> Ma Virgilio n’avea lasciati scemi > di sé, Virgilio dolcissimo patre, > Virgilio a cui per mia salute die’mi;

\(^9\) See Manuele Gragnolati, “‘Forse non pur per loro, ma per le mamme’. La nostalgia del Paradiso e gli abbracci della Commedia,” in Amor che move, Linguaggio del corpo e forma del desiderio in Dante, Pasolini e Morante (Milan: il Saggiatore, 2013), 91-110; Gragnolati, Experiencing the Afterlife: Soul and Body in Dante and Medieval Culture (Notre Dame, Indiana: Notre Dame University Press, 2005), 53–86.
né quantunque perdeo l’antica matre,

valse a le guance nette di rugiada

del vostro, lagrimando, non tornasser atre (Purg. 30.46-54)

Now, a great deal has already been written about this passage as a farewell, as a lament, as an elegy, to say nothing of its own Virgilian undertones. Less attention has been given, however, to how Dante and his readers are made to “see” Virgil’s absence here, and this is where scholarship from various fields, not least theatre and film studies, may shed some important light. This is a moment, after all, which borders on the filmic: Dante’s perspective is oriented towards a space in the Earthly Paradise which turns out to be empty. As the film theorist Justin Remes has observed, “absence can only be understood in contrast to what might have been present,” and it is this frustrated expectation that makes Dante’s experience of Virgil’s absence so acute.\textsuperscript{12} The readers’ expectations are doubly undercut by the syntactic arrangement of the passage itself: the words “per dicere a Virgilio” introduce Dante’s speech as if it were a full, spoken utterance, but then we learn that it is only what Dante would have said had Virgil been there: we “hear” Dante’s words, only to be told that we did not actually hear them. That emphatic, line-initial, “adversative ma” is the first indicator that what we have just “heard” was never really said.\textsuperscript{13} It is an unrealized utterance which constitutes an important example of the poem’s “alternate plotlines” recently richly discussed by Nicolò Crisafi: moments in which the poem gestures towards alternative, contingent versions of itself which run contrary to the teleological pull of what Crisafi calls the poem’s “master narrative”.\textsuperscript{14} This particular contingent moment is uniquely destabilizing, for even as it foreshadows the Commedia’s long-anticipated scene of reunion, it introduces what Robert Hollander has called the “momento virgiliano più palpabilmente tragico dell’intero poema.”\textsuperscript{15} On the verge of the poem’s supreme moment of comedy, that is to say, we reach an affective nadir which strikes all the more keenly as our anticipation of presence and of language is met instead with silence and personal absence.\textsuperscript{16}

The result is that we, along with Dante, experience a spatial and linguistic void: an empty space which brings to mind Muriel Spark’s poem “Elementary,” in which a “cat subsiding down a \textsuperscript{13} Freccero, “Manfred’s Wounds,” 208. This “ma” constitutes a major example of what poet-critic Jerry Harp calls a “mid-course turn.” See “The Mid-Course Turn,” in Structure and Surprise: Engaging Poetic Turns, ed. Michael Theune (New York: Teachers and Writers Collaborative: 2007), 147-166. Carl Dennis goes so far as to suggest that such turns can denote shifts in genre as well as narrative direction: a consideration which corroborates Hollander’s sense of Virgilian tragedy in Eden. See Carl Dennis, Poetry as Persuasion (London: University of Georgia Press, 2001).

\textsuperscript{15} Hollander, “Tragedia nella Commedia,” 131.

\textsuperscript{16} The notion of absence and its relation to generic instability is one of the key arguments introduced in Robert Martin Adams, Nil: Episodes in the Literary Conquest of Void During the Nineteenth Century (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1966). See especially pp.89-106.
This notion of subsidence provides a productive way to frame our thinking around the word scemare in relation to absence: it implies that a being may cease to be visible in a given environment, while traces of that being are left behind in the environment, and can be “seen” despite the absence of the being itself. Further, it bespeaks not a sudden disappearance, but rather a kind of literary slow-fade. Just so, the purgatorial instances of scemare gradually draw their readers into sensations of moonlessness, mountainlessness and, finally, Virgillessness. It is made clear to Dante at the very outset of his journey that Virgil will, at some point, leave him: “anima fia a ciò più di me degna: / con lei ti lascerò nel mio partire” (Inf. 1.122–123), and Dante himself will reiterate this fact as late as Purgatorio 23 during his conversation with Forese Donati: “Tanto dice di fârmi sua compagna / che io sarò là dove fia Beatrice; / quivi convien che sanza lui rimagna. / Virgilio è questi che così mi dice” (Purg. 23.127–130). The textual space which Virgil occupies as a personal presence is strictly delineated even from the outset of the poem: his absence is forecast as soon as he arrives.

Virgil’s subsidence into personal absence, then, is hidden in plain sight throughout the narrative space between his arrival and his departure: over the course of sixty-four cantos, Virgil undergoes a process of diminution in which the future “ti lascerò” becomes the pluperfect “n’avea lasciati scemi.” The shift from the singular pronoun tu to the plural noi is also particularly significant. Lloyd H. Howard has noted that the noi of the line “Virgilio n’avea lasciati scemi di sè” includes Statius as well as Dante, but in reality the pronoun is more inclusive than this. It is a noi which also encompasses the reader who, more so than Statius, has borne witness to the growth and diminution of Virgil’s presence over the course of the poem: the reader is utterly implicit in the plural adjective scemi. We have been made to interact with and, in some measure, participate in the purgative penè of the mountain, and here, as the poem gathers in its lexicon of exclusion, we are drawn into this drama of absence and loss, even as the poem re-presences

19 Howard juxtaposes Inferno 1 and Purgatorio 23 in Virgil the Blind Guide, 118.
Beatrice who will guide Dante through Paradiso. This sense of diminishment is strengthened still further by the fact that scemare’s appearance in Canto 30 occurs in a context in which the language of absence proliferates: lasciare recurs, having been applied to Virgil’s departure in the selva oscura, and salute, perdeo, and non tornare all operate alongside scemare to convey the enormity of Virgil’s absence.

Further, given the dynamic interplay of absence and presence in Purgatorio 30 as a whole, it hardly seems incidental that the canto also contains one of only three uses of the word presenza in the Commedia:

\[
\begin{align*}
\text{E lo spirito mio, che già cotanto} \\
\text{tempo era stato ch’è la sua presenza} \\
\text{non era di stupor, tremando, affranto,} \\
\text{sanza de li occhi aver più conoscenza,} \\
\text{per occulta virtù che da lei mosse,} \\
\text{d’antico amor sentì la gran potenza (Purg. 30.34-36)}
\end{align*}
\]

As well as strengthening the juxtaposition of presence and absence in the canto, this sense of Beatrice’s presenza casts significant light on Dante’s notion of the dynamism of the two concepts. This is something which Dante also explores in the Convivio, the only text of his in which the word assenza appears. Accounting for our variable experience of the constant brightness of a star, Dante writes: “Transmutasi questo mezzo di molta luce in poca luce, sì come alla presenza del sole e alla sua assenza” (Conv. 3.9.12). Now, it is possible to interpret this astronomical explanation in terms of a simple dichotomy: things, in this case the light of the sun, can be present, or they can be absent. I think the notion of a transition from molta luce to poca luce, however, demands that we approach the terms rather differently. It points not towards a simple binary between absence and presence, but rather a continuum on which place is never fixed. There are, that is to say, gradations of absence and presence, and Purgatorio 30, perhaps more than any other canto in the Commedia, dramatizes Dante’s sense of this continuum between personal presence and absence. Beatrice’s return to presence is, after all, gradual: it is sensed before it is witnessed. Her face is initially occluded “sotto verde manto” (v.32),

---

22 The others are Paradiso 11.101 and Paradiso 27.24.
and though this veil nominally conceals her, its conspicuous color, along with that of her robe, “di fiamma viva” (v.33) serve to convey her presence through allusion to her appearance in Vita nuova (Vn. 2.3). Her voice is then heard at length before she finally and triumphantly announces herself: “Guardaci ben! Ben sem, ben sem Beatrice” (v.73). The poem’s re-presencing of Beatrice, then, occurs through a gradual process of allusion, followed by speech, followed by self-declaration. She “fades in” just as Virgil “fades out.” Teodolinda Barolini has explored Paradiso in terms of its “paradoxes of più e meno,” and here in the Earthly Paradise, Dante stages an anticipatory drama of più e meno in which Beatrice’s return is set against, and is in some measure contingent on, Virgil’s diminution. It is a drama, moreover, which enacts St John’s sense of the need to diminish in the presence of Christ: “He must increase, but I must decrease” (John, 3:30, NIV). This relationship between Christ and John the Baptist in relation to Beatrice is a dynamic Dante also explores in Vita nuova: the sonnet “Io mi sentì svegliar dentro a lo core” accentuates Dante’s artistic and affective breaking from cavalcantian poetics in ways which are revisited in this culminating moment of poetic transcendence in Purgatorio (Vn. 24.7-9). It is significant also that this is the moment in Vita nuova at which Beatrice—as Christ comes to fully displace the hitherto dominating presence of the personified Amor: “Amor mi disse: ‘Quella, è Primavera, / e quella ha’nome Amor, sì mi somiglia’” (13-14). It is not only Giovanna—as-Baptist, then, whose presence is made to diminish in this sonnet: here all sense of Amor’s personal presence is utterly subsumed by Beatrice, as Virgil’s is in Purgatorio. As Dante explains in the subsequent prose in the libello:

24 I am grateful to Thomas Graff for pointing me towards John, 3:30 in relation to Purgatorio 30.
Here, then, the purported substantiality of Amor is revealed to have been illusory, despite the fact that, up until this moment of revelation, Dante has cultivated for him such a strong personal presence that he is able to move, speak, and even laugh (Vn. 25.2). It is a radical form of diminution which, much like Virgil’s departure in Purgatorio 30, serves the important function of “presencing” Beatrice as the affective object of focus. The various forms of diminution at work at this juncture in Vita nuova constitute an important precursor to the drama of departure and return in the Earthly Paradise. As Howard has observed, as the journey up the mountain approaches its terminus, “there is ever less place for a pre-Christian like Virgil.”

His pagan presence must decrease so that Beatrice’s salvific presence can increase.

The biblical model of gradual decrease can, in fact, be productively applied to Virgil’s trajectory towards personal absence in Purgatorio as a whole. Widening our focus to consider the purgatorial narrative more broadly, it becomes clear that Dante draws out the drama of Virgil’s decreasing presence across the second cantica, with Canto 30 serving as an end-point for the gradual process of personal subsidence. Thus, there is no haptic contact between Dante and Virgil after Purgatorio 16. Shortly thereafter, Virgil ceases to be “lo mio maestro e l’ mio autore” (Inf., 1.85) and becomes one of two “miei poeti” (Purg. 28.146), and his final words to Dante, “Non aspettar mio dir più né mio cenno” (Purg. 27.139) occur three cantos before Dante becomes aware of his absence. Virgil’s personal presence in the poem, then, is in itself a scemare: his agency diminishes and, eventually, so does our sense of him as a figure present in the narrative. Giuseppe Ledda has recently noted that Virgil’s narrative trajectory in Purgatorio is 28 Barolini summarizes Virgil’s trajectory of decreasing agency through the apt image of an hourglass: “When Vergil arrives, an hourglass is set, and the grains of sand fall one by one until, in Purgatorio XXX, the glass is empty.” See “Epic Resolution” in Dante’s Poets: Textuality and Truth in the Comedy, (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1984), 188-286, 202.

---

one in which “si avvia a diventare più un compagno di viaggio che una guida,” and this altered dynamic is plainly visible when Dante’s and Virgil’s eyes meet for the last time in Purgatorio 29.55-57: “Io mi rivolsi d’ammirazion pieno / al buon Virgilio, ed esso mi rispose / con vista carca di stupor non meno.” This is a very different Virgil to the “maestro cortese” of the first cantica (Inf. 3.121), who was able to successfully navigate the infernal landscape, and to be the (literal) vehicle of Dante’s conversion at the bottom of Hell. This is a Virgil whose pagan wisdom can hold no further currency and who, true to his final spoken lines, can offer neither word nor gesture, but only a look of blank surprise.

Nor should the fact that Dante physically turns towards Virgil in these deeply affecting moments be lost on us. As has been widely noted, Dante’s staging of absence in Purgatorio 30 is undergirded by Virgil’s own narrative concerning absence in the fourth Georgic, and particularly by Orpheus’ lament at the loss of Eurydice after he turns back towards her in the underworld. While commentators have tended to focus on Orpheus’ language at this moment in Virgil’s poem, widening our intertextual lens to include the event of Eurydice’s disappearance may cast a more direct light on the process of Virgil’s disappearance. At the moment of Orpheus’ turning, we are told, Eurydice “ex oculis subito, ceu fumus in auras / commixitus tenuis, fugit diversa, neque illum / prensantem nequiquam umbras et multa volentem / dicere praeterea vidit” (Georgics, 4.499-502). The pathos of these lines lies in the fact that Eurydice is not simply present one moment and gone the next: she leaves traces of smoke and shadow which gradually dissipate. Virgil’s subsidence from Dante’s poem is just such another process of dissipation, but one which spans an entire cantica, and which takes on a multitude of forms. As Dante turns to Virgil, in Orphic fashion, in order to cite Virgil’s own Aeneid to him, we find that Virgil, like Eurydice, has subsided, leaving an affective empty space behind him. That this void is witnessed in

---

31 Ledda, “Sulla presenza di Virgilio nel Paradiso,” 123.
34 “Suddenly fled in all directions from his eyes, like smoke into thin air, and though he grasped at the shadows and longed to say more, she did not see him” (translation mine).
between Dante’s sensing of Beatrice’s presence and her eventual self-announcement is especially noteworthy: an experience of absence is nested within an experience of presence in what Rachel Jacoff calls the “double motion of disappearance/appearance.” With this idea in mind, and if affect “arises in the midst of in-between-ness,” as Gregory Seigworth and Melissa Gregg have suggested, then it is little wonder that Purgatorio 30 constitutes the Commedia’s greatest affective crux. For the first time since the selva oscura, after all, Dante is momentarily without a guide. Or, rather, he is momentarily in-between two guides, and this affective in-between-ness is heightened by the fact that this moment, characterized by departure and reunion, is overtly framed between language and silence; between presence and absence.

And Virgil himself falls into a sui generis form of “in-between-ness” after the moment of his departure. What Auerbach calls the “Vigilian element” persists into Paradiso, a realm where articulations of absence become all the more complex. Indeed, the concentrated interplay of presence and absence in Purgatorio 30 primes us for a new poetics of absence in the third cantica, where absence is experienced in radically different ways. Sure enough, when scemare appears in Paradiso, it acquires new resonances which retrospectively gloss scemare as applied to Virgil in the Earthly Paradise.

Glossing the divine logic of salvation in Paradiso 20, the Eagle of Justice entreats:

E voi, mortali, tenetevi stretti
a giudicar: ché noi, che Dio vedemo, non conosciamo ancor tutti li eletti;
ed ënne dolce cosí fatto scemo,
perché il ben nostro in questo ben s'affina, che quel che vole Iddio, e noi volemo (Par. 20.133-138)

In the upper reaches of Paradise, then, a fatto scemo is something not to be lamented, but celebrated. Lessening and lack are to be understood very differently in the third realm, where knowledge operates in new ways, and where experiences of personal absence are disentangled from grief.\(^{39}\) Indeed, given its radically new poetics of desire, \textit{Paradiso} is able to dramatize the notion that experiences of lack need not be bound up with sensations of loss. If \textit{scemare} functions throughout \textit{Purgatorio} as a particular form of diminution, in \textit{Paradiso} it reveals the importance of what is left behind. To that end, the word “\textit{dolce}” in this passage should not be lost on us either. Alongside \textit{scemare}, \textit{dolce} serves to strengthen the linguistic connection between these words of the eagle and Dante’s farewell to Virgil in \textit{Purgatorio} 30. As Barolini has observed, Virgil is referred to as \textit{dolce} no fewer than twelve times in the second \textit{cantica} and, most emphatically, as Dante’s “dolcissimo patre” in Canto 30.\(^{40}\) Further, \textit{Paradiso} 20 is a canto whose eschatological occupations are underpinned by the unexpected personal presence of Trajan and Ripheus: characters who bring the question of Virgil’s own personal absence once again to the fore.\(^{41}\) In his work on the paradoxical presence/absence of Christ in the \textit{Commedia}, Peter Hawkins posits that “rather than referring to his \textit{absence} […] we would do better to speak of his \textit{refracted presence} within it,” and it is in such densely Virgilian moments in \textit{Paradiso} that Virgil’s own refracted, intertextual presence is refocused despite, or perhaps because of, his personal absence.\(^{42}\) Indeed, such persistent Virgilian resonances lead Vittorio Montemaggi to suggest that “it is precisely by being absent that Virgil can continue to nourish Dante.”\(^{43}\) These are notions which have, in fact, been captured in revealing ways in artistic responses to Virgil’s \textit{scemare} and final departure. One particularly striking example is Liam Ó Broin’s 2021 lithograph of \textit{Purgatorio} 27:\(^{44}\)

\(^{39}\) Jennifer Rushworth discusses this aspect of the \textit{Commedia}’s spiritual progression in terms of Freudian decathexis. See “Mourning and \textit{acedia} in Dante” in \textit{Discourses of Mourning}, 18-53.

\(^{41}\) On the unexpected presence of Trajan and Ripheus, see Robin Kirkpatrick, “Dante and his difficulties,” in \textit{Dante’s \textit{Inferno}: Difficulty and Dead Poetry}, (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987), 1-33, 18.

\(^{43}\) Montemaggi, “Pride and Prayer,” 237.

\(^{44}\) Reproduced by kind permission of the artist. Following collaboration with the Centre for Dante Studies in Ireland, Ó Broin’s lithographs of the \textit{Commedia} are available to view at \url{https://www.commediadivinaonlinexhibition.com/home}.

~ 324 ~
At the center of the flame in the foreground of Ó Broin’s image, in a pictorial landscape that brims with color, the viewer’s eye is drawn to two white silhouettes: one a nervous Dante, the other an erect, confident Virgil, guiding his charge through the “’ncendio sanza metro” of the terrace of lust (Purg. 27.51). The focal point of the image, then, is a blank space describing the outlines of the two poets. In purely visual terms, Ó Broin harnesses empty space in order to prime his viewer’s interpretative faculties in such a way that they cannot but read the image in terms of the presence/absence dialectic. We see absence on the visual plane here, just as Dante contrives for us to see it in the textual drama of the Earthly Paradise. Ó Broin fixes his viewer’s attention on “Virgillessness,” capturing in an image the textual interplay of presence and absence at this juncture in Dante’s poem. We cannot but note, after all, that in Purgatorio 27 these two figures are approaching diametrically opposed teloi. For while Dante is on the verge of his culminating moment of purgation, and thus of personal and spiritual fulfilment, Virgil’s personal presence in the narrative is reaching its terminus.

Dante’s personhood here verges on completion, and this is strikingly juxtaposed, in Ó Broin’s image as in Dante’s poem, with Virgil’s immanent personal absence. This artistic response to “Virgillessness,” then, allows us more fully to appreciate how absence functions in the Commedia at large. Like Spark’s cat, the author of the Aeneid leaves a void behind him, yet he remains a vital intertextual presence throughout the third cantica, lasting even up to the poem’s closing moments. In the context of Paradiso’s paradoxes of più e meno, Virgil’s presence is reduced, but not to zero. Approaching “Virgillessness,” then, gives us an opportunity to interrogate more fully how absence functions between cantiche, and scemare, a word vital to Dante’s articulation of absence, allows the poem to lay bare the continuum between presence and absence in operation across its three realms. It is not, Dante insists, a simple case of one or the other.

---
